A question about SDRs today got me wondering about something I have never had to deal with before: Say I have an SDR and want to use a 2.4 GHz adapter to connect to a wireless network. I would assume that the 2.4 GHz adapter would have a data rate of 2.4 GHz, and the SDR would have to match this. But on the SDR forums, I saw a lot of discussions about the HD8601 SDR, where the data rate is only 128 Kbps. So my questions are: What data rate do most/all adapters for an SDR have? If a particular adapter only has 128 Kbps, what frequency range does it cover? A: The other adapters that are usually used are either matched to the SDR data rate, or have a "loose" tunable range. The general rule of thumb is to start at the lower data rate and go up. This is much easier if you are connecting to an AP that only uses one SSID. When
