Q: Why is it not a good idea to use NHibernate for IoC? I was reading about the following and I found that it's a bad practice and it contradicts with the IoC (inversion of control) principle. IoC : IoC is a software design pattern where you tell (inversion of control) to a class, who is responsible to create an instance of it. NHibernate : NHibernate has a default IoC (inversion of control), which basically tell the SessionFactory who is the repository factory, who is the session factory, who is the transaction manager.

A: IoC is a design pattern. The patterns are just guidelines and best practices. The patterns help you in developing a software, which is efficiently, properly and properly structured. The concept of IoC is concerned with the responsibility, when the object of your interest is created, and when it is destroyed. The term IoC will not come into the picture when you are using NHibernate. You already have its IoC, which in turn has a default IoC functionality. This default functionality of NHibernate makes sure that all the database calls like queries, inserts and updates are done in a transaction, so as to ensure that the database or the tables are not corrupted. So, you have already got, for free, the IoC functionality of NHibernate, when you use

NHibernate for your project. In other words, the default IoC functionality of NHibernate has already got your attention and hence, you will not need to use other IoCs. In short, the default IoC functionality of NHiber
